If an Android OEM developers spends enough time in making a recovery as capable as the recovery of a previous-generation device, then he will end up with a recovery that would be very hard to customize. This is because a powerful recovery means a robust one and it has the capability to work with mods that require some in-depth knowledge, but a stock recovery cannot do so. As has been said before, the stock recovery is designed to work with the pre-installed apps. If a recovery provides a wide range of customizations, then it becomes a powerful recovery that could be used for all kinds of customizations. If a recovery is not able to keep up with the developments in other communities, then it is very hard to customize it. If you want to create a custom ROM that incorporates several custom components, then you would need to have a community ready for their release at your disposal. Getting such community ready is difficult due to the nature of Android. For example, a recovery built by XDA Senior Member RetroDesktone has been praised for his results in creating a great recovery known as TWRP 2. For this reason, the community loved the recovery and willing to pay for it. You cannot access the recovery without fastboot even when adb is connected to the device and the phone is switched off. If the adb command returns the error error: device not found, please make sure adb is connected. You need to first install the drivers for the adb driver. For this, connect your phone to your PC and then navigate to the Control Panel (Win XP/Vista/Win 7) and select device manager, followed by finding and right-clicking on the Infrared (IR) Adapter and installing the driver. On the phone, connect your device to the computer with the USB cable and open the command prompt. If adb is connected, you can run the adb kill-server command from your phone and then start the adb command with the adb devices command. If adb is not connected to the device, you need to install the drivers for the adb driver. For this, connect your phone to your PC and then navigate to the Control Panel (Win XP/Vista/Win 7) and select device manager, followed by finding and right-clicking on the Infrared (IR) Adapter and installing the driver. 5ec8ef588b
